Urban Education Semester

Last summer I lived in New York as a student teaching in an East Harlem classroom. I worked with a class of seventh and eighth graders. It's a bizarre age; the frantic scramble for social recognition takes precedence over almost everything else making the job of the teacher just that more of a challenge. The school I worked in was struggling to develop progressive techniques, to breakdown models of authoritarian teaching and tailor the content and methods to the needs of its student body—ideally, to foster inquisitive minds rather than to mass produce academic machines. In this cauldron of educational innovation, my experience was at once frightening and overwhelming, inspiring and though-provoking, demanding, joyful, exhausting and deeply rewarding.

I was only one of fifteen students from a variety of New England colleges taking part in this experience, called the Urban Education Semester. All of the members of the group were wonderful and supportive, but, unfortunately, only four of them were of African descent. The classrooms most of us taught in were predominantly if not entirely composed of low-income Black children, but not many Black college students took advantage of this opportunity to learn about and experience first-hand the changing trends in education, changes which will be vitally important to the survival of our community.

The experience was not always wonderful and neither was the program. But it was an experience unlike any other I've had at Brown. I am writing this essay for the African Sun to let Black students on this campus know what opportunities are available to those who are interested in education or hope more Black students will realize how crucial our participation in a program like this is to helping improve the future of our community.

Participants in the Urban Education Semester student teach three days a week and take education courses at Bank Street College of Education (students receive credit at Brown for a full semester's coursework). Applications are due October 15. If you have any questions about application procedures call Laura Pierce at x3013. If you have any questions about the experience itself, please feel free to call me. My number is 272-9613.
